growing american ears (filters) it takes between 100 and 1000 hrs to master hearing it varies widely for different individuals language is primarily an activity of the mouth and ears... not the hand and eyes language goes back many 10s of 1000s of years... maybe much further reading/writing is only a few centuries old for the majority of humans the web is an ideal place for this kind of instruction... far better than what i can do in a classroom on the web, every student gets absolutely individualized instruction no incentive to share passwords because it will destroy the integrity of their personal database i didn't appreciate your recent comment that i "tend to go on and on" i do talk for several minutes on occasion, but i don't just ramble on i have a point to make and make it in as economical a way as i can i'm not interested in wasting my time or anyone else's usually the things i say here are subjects i've given a great deal of thought to... often having written them out and struggled to say them in the fewest possible words and still get the idea across adequately

if it's old news to you or you're just not interested in what i have to say... fine you've been around a while it's probably not old news to many of the younger people here who may find some value in what i contribute

"Self-esteem is a protective shield designed to control the potential for terror that results from awareness of the horrifying possibility that we humans are merely transient animals groping to survive in a meaningless universe, designed only to die and decay. From this perspective, each individual human's name and identity, family and social identifications, goals and aspirations, occupation and title, and humanly created adornments are draped over an animal that, in the cosmic scheme of things, may be no more significant or enduring than any individual potato, pineapple, or porcupine." starbucks you are about to lose a long-time, loyal customer your recent "redesign" of store number 5724 is an example of the worst planning i've seen in a while this store has been my favorite for more than 3 years now i must drive past four other starbucks to get to this one but no longer i'm going to start looking for a new place you've reduced the total seating capacity there's enough empty floor space to hold a dance there's still no adequate window shades to reduced the sun that beats on customers' back thru the huge window.

why you would waste corporate funds in these times to "redesign" a store that didn't need it is beyond me you not only waste your money but have alienated many of your steady and loyal customers twice in the past week, i've been unable to find a place to sit put it back to the way it was or at least add some more tables whoever you hired to manage this redesign is incompetent you've reduced the total number of electrical outlets i can only assume that you're trying to get rid of people like me congratulations... you have succeeded customers have already begun to rearrange the furniture to make it serve their needs better

HILLNoo7, a drunk used-car salesman from arizona, discovered the zeitgeist movement several weeks ago and showed up on the ts3 server to share his vast knowledge of how to save Earth by using sales techniques. this recording begins after we had already spent more than an hour dealing with him. normally i wouldn't waste my time with someone in his condition, but i think it is instructive to observe his behavior, although it's not fun.

the price argument against apple

.i've been a mac user since 1984

.i've never owned anything else, although i have used PCs in a work environment

.i still hear people whining about the price of apple products, even though the difference, if any, is minor these days

.here's my take on it

.it's not really an issue of price

.it's an issue of priorities/values

.some of the people i know who complain about mac pricing drive around in fiftythousand dollar BMWs

.i drive a 20-year-old honda civic

.it's reliable; it gets great mileage; the air conditioning works; and it still looks good

.i have no intention of getting another car any time soon

.so it appears to be a matter of values

.some people would rather spend their money on a fancy car and other consumer items

.i prefer to spend my money on things that are most important to my life

.there is no "thing" in my life more important than my computer

.i'll pay whatever i have to to get what i consider to be the best for my needs

.i have two macs... a mac mini and a 17" MBP, with 8 GBs of ram and a 7200 rpm 500 GB hd

.i like the OS; and i like the hardware; and i like the way things just work...

most of the time

.the MBP cost me almost $3000

.i think it's worth every cent of it

.i'm worth it

.anyone who pays more than $10,000 for a car and won't buy a mac because it costs too much... has a very different value system than mine review of tractatus

Since most of the reviews of the Tractatus here contain either fawning praise or vituperation without much expository content, it may perhaps be useful to give an account, in reasonably clear terms, of what this book is actually about. Granted that my account is somewhat simplified, it will still be better than quasi-mystical gushing praise or bitter un-argued criticism. The central idea of the Tractatus is expressed very clearly at proposition 4.01 and certain comments following it:

A proposition is a model of reality as we imagine it." [4.01]

"At first sight a proposition--one set out on the printed page, for example--does not seem to be a picture of the reality with which it is concerned. But neither do written notes seem at first sight to be a picture of a piece of music . . . And yet these sign-languages prove to be pictures, even in the ordinary sense, of what they represent." [4.011]

"A gramophone record, the musical idea, the written notes, and the sound-waves, all stand to one another in the same internal relation of depicting that holds between language and the world. They are all construed according to a common logical pattern." [4.014]

So, Wittgenstein's basic view in the Tractatus is simple: statements ("propositions") are pictures or models of the situations they are about. The sequence of words "The cat is on the mat" would be taken by him to picture the situation that consists in one object (the cat) standing in a certain relation (being on) to another object (the mat). Or rather, this would be the way to understand this proposition if the cat and mat themselves were indivisible atoms, without any smaller parts. Since, actually, the cat is made up of a great many smaller parts, as is the mat, the full analysis of "The cat is on the mat" would be much more complicated. But basically, a proposition is a picture of the situation it describes just as the notes on a sheet of music depict a melody, and just as the written letters "pop" depict a certain sound. In breaking down the cat and the mat, we must eventually come to a point where things can't be broken down any further, with objects that are the basic constituents of reality. The relationships between these basic objects, which Wittgenstein just calls "objects", but which others have called "logical atoms", constitute the most elementary situations. These situations are described by what he calls "elementary propositions". Given a bunch of elementary propositions, we can combine and re-combine them by certain basic operations, called truth-functional operations, which are explained in any textbook of elementary formal logic. Two such operations are conjunction and negation. So, given three atoms, a, b, and c, and a relation R (R might be the relation "being on", as with the cat and the mat), we have, as elementary propositions, for instance:

aRb ("a is on b") bRc ("b is on c") aRc ("a is on c")

Then we can make new, compound propositions like

(aRb & bRc)

~aRc

(aRb & bRc) & ~aRc

Where "&" just means "and", as in "The cat is on the mat and the cherry is on the tree", and "~" means "It is not the case that", as in "It is not the case that the cat is on the mat". So the first of the above three compounds means "a is on b and b is on c", and the second means "It is not the case that a is on c", that is, a is not on c. You can easily work out the third one for yourself.

By means of operations like this (actually, Wittgenstein uses a different, but equivalent operation), one can build up an enormous stock of compound propositions. In fact, according to Wittgenstein, anything that can be said at all can be said by taking elementary propositions and applying operations like this repeatedly (albeit you might have to apply such operations infinitely, or to an infinite collection of propositions). Basically, then, given the simplest pictures of the world, we can stitch them together into more and more complicated pictures, and these yield all the statements and thoughts we can make, or at least all the ones that make any sense. Every meaningful statement ultimately breaks down to elementary propositions, propositions entirely in terms of simple signs or names (like "a" and "b") that stand for logical atoms. Everything that can be said meaningfully can, in principle, be broken down like this. This is the basic idea of logical atomism. Most of the technical work in this book consists of machinery for reducing all propositions of science and mathematics to combinations of elementary propositions. In the process, Wittgenstein shows you, he thinks, how to reduce claims with notions like "all" and "some" (like "All whales are mammals", "Some lawyers are crooks") and numerical claims ("There are four books on the shelf") to combinations of elementary propositions. If Wittgenstein succeeds in this, he considers himself to have shown that his "picture theory" of language is correct.

Okay, now you want to know, what's the **philosophical** point of all this? Well, for one thing, it means that anything you **can't** picture cannot be expressed by a meaningful proposition. If you try to speak of things that can't be pictured in Wittgenstein's way, you end up talking nonsense, in that what you are saying won't be true or false. Such utterances may express how you feel, or they may serve some other function (besides saying something) but they won't **say** anything that can be true (or false), and so there won't be any point in **arguing** about it. And what "things" are these, that you can't meaningfully talk about? The short answer is, all of traditional philosophy. Take ethics, for instance: "things" like right and wrong, or good and bad, can't be pictured, and so ethical "propositions" like "Murder is wrong" don't say anything. Maybe they express your feelings, or reflect some psychological fact, but they are not true or false. Likewise for religious claims that defy picturing, like "God is love" or "Brahman manifests itself in all things". Likewise for metaphysical claims about God or substance or causation or any underlying non-empirical reality. Likewise for epistemological worries about justification or rationality; these cannot be pictured in the requisite way either (hence Wittgenstein dismisses skepticism as nonsense). Wittgenstein's views of language are **so** restrictive that most of what philosophers have wanted to talk about turn out to fall into the category of the unspeakable, what he calls "the mystical". The mystical is what cannot be pictured, what is therefore beyond the realm of logic, reasoning, and articulate speech. About it, Wittgenstein claims, we cannot speak, and therefore we should be silent.

Oddly enough, Wittgenstein's own book turns out to be an attempt to talk about the mystical. For one of the things that cannot be pictured, is the very fact, as Wittgenstein takes it to be, that propositions are pictures of reality. (Think about it: how can you make a picture that says that propositions are pictures of reality? There's no way to do it along the lines of "The cat is on the mat", is there?) In fact, every attempt to talk about the relation between language and reality is itself an attempt to speak of the unspeakable, to attempt to characterize what can't be pictured. Wittgenstein recognizes this and responds thus:

"My propositions serve as elucidations in the following way: anyone who understands me eventually recognizes them as nonsensical, when he has used them--as steps--to climb up beyond them. (He must, so to speak, throw away the ladder after he has climbed up it.)

He must transcend these propositions, and then he will see the world aright." [6.54]

Wittgenstein's Tractatus itself, then, is a violation of his commandment to be silent in the face of the mystical. And once it is *recognized* as a violation, Wittgenstein hopes you will throw the book away and return to the ordinary, empirical world, free of any further desire to do philosophy, having gotten a clear vision of language and the world that makes it obvious to you that philosophy is a mistaken attempt to speak of the unspeakable. (You can now see why this book provokes bitter hostility in those who cherish traditional philosophy--after all, it says they're wasting their time!) But if so, how can Wittgenstein himself be right in writing the book? Isn't **it** a mistaken attempt to speak about the unspeakable? Yes and no. Yes, it **is** an attempt to say what can't be said--hence, once you understand it, paradoxically, you see that it's nonsense! But it is not a **mistaken** attempt, rather it is a self-conscious attempt, made necessary by our confusion and unclarity about the world while we are still enmeshed in the tangles of traditional philosophy. While that nonsense imprisons us, we cannot recognize it **as** nonsense, and as such, like mentally deranged people, we have to be approached **with** nonsense if we are to be cured--nonsense is all we respond to. So this book is a kind of curative "nonsense", like a purgative for the soul; it is meant to cleanse the mind of philosophical confusion (that is, of philosophy itself) and, at the end, to remove itself as the final piece of "confusion". To use a computer metaphor, the Tractatus is a program that wipes your whole philosophical "hard drive", and erases itself as its final operation. And after that final erasure, we return to the ordinary world, free of philosophy, in the deafening silence that is our acknowledgement of "das Mystiche" - the mystical in, and above, the ordinary.

.it is always NOW
.you cannot experience past... there is no past
.you cannot experience future... there is no future
.NOW is constantly changing

.a large part of "awakening" involves a deep realization of just how little i

- .we are essentially language creatures
- .language is more important than biology
- .we can't go back to our pre-linguistic past

- .people live on autopilot (ap)
- .english is the language of their ap
- .people mess up their lives because their aps are badly programmed
- .removing the 4 stupidities of english will give you a better autopilot your life will be happier and more productive knowing all about the 4 stupidities will make absolutely NO difference in your life

actually reprogramming your ap to become conscious of the stupidities we think and say is a game changer... if you want

Compassion and Intelligence

There is no spirituality without ambiguity. The time fast approaches when individuality will no longer be able to withstand the forces of reality. Until now, people have been content with mere existence. But now we must move beyond analysis to intuition. For we must always remember that the fundamental force behind faith is not introspection, but diligence. And of course, we all know that the convergence of philosophy and failure leads inevitably to greater reason. The Age of enlightenment has arrived.

Which side are you on?

sylvia's blog

It's been a while since I was touched by a movie. But today I was deeply touched by a dog in the movie Hachi---a lovely, loyal dog called Hachi. Here goes the story :

In Bedridge, Professor Parker Wilson found an abandoned dog at the train station. He took it home with an intention of returning the dog to its owner. During his stay in Parker's house, Parker had a good time with him and tried to teach him how to fetch the ball. But no matter how hard parker tried, the dog just didn't seem to have at least a bit of interest in the ball. Parker didn't understand why until one day he visited his japanese friend, Ken, who told him that the dog is a special akita breed. Ken found a japanese number of 8(Hachi) on its collar and told Parker the 8(Hachi) is a number of fortune in Japanese and the spiritual significance of 8(Hachi) is "reaches up to heaven, comes down to earth." Ken also told Parker that the Akita is not like the other dogs, they won't fetch a ball unless there is a reason for them to do so. Anyway, a few days passed and nobody came to claim Hachi. So Parker's family decides to keep Hachi. The very special friend Hachi would accompany his master Parker to the train station every day and return each afternoon to greet him from work. They enjoyed each other's companionship very much. But sadly Parker died one day at work and never returned to the station. Remember what Ken said earlier? --An Akita would never fetch a ball unless there was a reason to do so. On the day Parker passed away, which was just an ordinary day, Parker kissed his wife goodbye and waited for Hachi to come with him to the station. But Hachi just keeps on barking and wouldn't go with him that day. Parker was very confused, but eventually he left the dog and went to the station alone. Just as he was approaching the station, Hachi appeared with the ball in his mouth, and at the station, this was the first time Hachi played the fetch game with Parker. Parker was so happy and surprised, seeing Hachi finally fetch. He had no idea by doing this, Hachi simply just didn't want him to leave because he had a bad feeling and sensed that might be their last time together. Parker did not return on that day and would never afterwards. But Hachi faithfully return to the same spot the very next day, and everyday for the next nine years to wait for his beloved Parker. He was so lost why Parker didn't show up. Poor dog!

Nine years is almost a lifetime for a dog, and this is exactly what Hachi spent waiting for his beloved master. The last scene of this movie is Hachi lying on the platform waiting for Parker, he was dying, but the last thing passing through his head was the happy times he spent with Parker and Parker's smiley face. He was dreaming Parker woke him up in the morning with his gentle patting . SO TOUCHING!

And this is a true story . People made a bronze statue of Hachi which now sits in his waiting spot outside the Shibuya station in Japan as a permanent tribute of his devotion, love, and above all, unwavering loyalty to his master.
